ON THE PRAGMATICS OF SLOW ATTENTION

Friday, Oct. 7 | 12:40 p.m.

Loyola Marymount University

University Hall, ECC 1857

Adam Nocek, Assistant Professor in the philosophy of technology
School of Arts, Media + Engineering, Arizona State University

This talk experiments with the following proposition: that slowness does not privilege one set of beliefs or values over another. Instead, slowness is a mode of learning and paying attention that resists the temptation to make evaluations and judgments on behalf of others. Nocek frames this proposition in terms of Alfred North Whitehead's rhythms of education and Isabelle Stengers' work on pragmatics and non-modern practices (e.g. sorcery, witchcraft, and animism).
